Language used only by certain people is called "slang." But slang can become popular if many people use it. For example, "stand someone up" was originally known by only a few people, but those who learned it from TV or radio programs began to use it. Now almost everybody in America knows what it means. If your friend says he will meet you somewhere at some time but does not come, you can say, "He stood me up!"

Slang is very important in every language. People who don't know certain slang may be in danger. There was a Japanese who went to study in America. One night he was looking for a friend's house. He thought he found it but when he approached the front door, a man with a gun in his hand was standing before him. He thought the Japanese was a thief and said, "Freeze!" The Japanese didn't understand him and came nearer. The man lowered his gun and said again, but louder, "Freeze!" The poor Japanese thought the man wanted to tell him something and went another step closer. Just then the man fired at the Japanese. He was killed instantly without even knowing why.
